1 RESEARCH METHODOLOGY USED IN THE IDENTIFICATION AND ANALYSIS OF THE STUDIES CONCERNING ROMA POPULATION IN ROMANIA

1.1. Introduction

The research concerning the ethnical groups, in the first half at the XX Century, has included little about the Roma. A number of high quality and fairly systematic studies were carried out in the thirties by Ion Chelcea, a well-known sociologist. After the Second World War, the Roma population research was generally ignored with few but notable exceptions. We can mention the research carried out over long periods of time by Gheorghe Nicolae and Mihai Merfea.

During the past few years the interest showed to this group has increased. After 1990 a number of important studies and research reports were published and the project "Dissemination of Roma Research" tried to identify them.

Generally speaking, the most important approaches in Roma research field are:

- The socio-economic perspective;
- The perspective of relationship with the authorities and public services;
- The identity perspective.

The socio-economic perspective is based on the assumption that Roma people problems are related to the poverty and the difficulty to ensure decent living conditions. The explanatory factors include: the level of revenues, the professional qualification, the participation on the labour market, the educational level and living conditions.

The perspective of relationship with the authorities and public services is another approach present in research. This approach is raising aspects related to an institutionalised discrimination of the Roma, in relation with public authorities and services. Discriminatory behaviours appear on the background of negative prejudice and stereotypes.

The identity perspective assumes that the Roma people carry a whole history behind, a set of traditions that constitute their specificity. The ethnic support is considered as central in problem determination and solution identification, adapted to the Roma way of living.

1.2. Research objectives

General purpose of the project

The project aimed at creating a comprehensive image on the research carried out in Romania on the Roma and disseminating the information obtained to all organisations interested in the subject: Roma organisations, government ministries, central agencies, municipal and regional governments, donors, the public at large.

Specific Objectives of the Project

1. Producing a master list of all substantial studies, reports and opinion polls that have been conducted about the Roma in Romania.
2. Developing a critique for analysing the components of the studies in order to summarise findings from various reports.

A "study" is a scientific paper, theoretical or using empirical data, based on a proper methodology and having as subject the situation of Roma in Romania. The study can be published, in print or as a research report.

A number of 160 studies having the characteristics described by our definition have been analysed. The results of the analysis are presented in the current research report.

Besides the 160 analysed studies, another 191 reports, volumes have been identified and they together constitute a complex bibliography of 351 research-oriented titles. They are all presented in the current research report and published on the Internet.

3. Making this information publicly available.

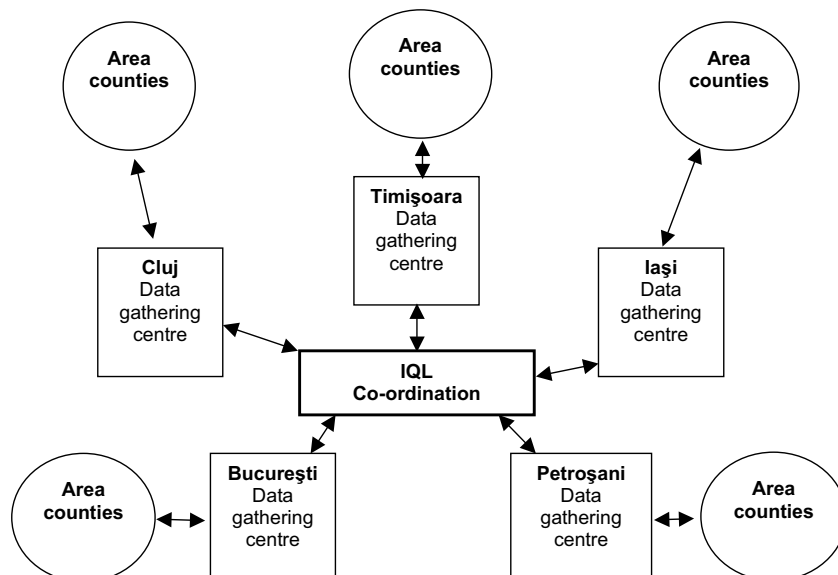

1.3. Research organisation

Preparing the research. Designing the methodology

Generally, the methodology was based on the principle of networking. A network of contacts was set up at the country level, constituted by individuals with previous experience in the subject.

These individuals (contacts) located in the most important university and research centres of Romania (Bucuresti, Cluj, Iasi, Timisoara) and other persons with expertise in this topic (Petrosani). These persons have acted as antennas for the institute and identified the sources of information needed for the survey (organisations, individuals who carried out surveys on Roma subject). They have been also channels for disseminating the results of the research to the organisations in their area.

Using as main source of information the network already established, a list of organisations and individuals involved in Roma research was set up. The information obtained was completed by surveying the Internet in order to gather data on national and international organisations with expertise in the field of interest. Together with the studies done by the Institute for Quality of Life the resulting list was a complete one.

- Research instruments

A complex questionnaire was designed in order to ensure that all information needed was systematically registered. The questionnaire contained two parts: the first one describing in detail the study/opinion poll and the subsequent reports/publications based on a complete set of indicators and the second one focused on organisational information (see Annex).

A number of questionnaires were pre-tested in order to ensure that the instrument was able to gather all the relevant data in the most effective format.

An Access database was developed following the indicators measured by questionnaire.

- Data gathering

Using the individuals (part of the network) as field operators the data have been gathered from the various parts of the country and sent to the Institute for Quality of Life.

The field operators have tried to establish long term relationships with the different organisations and individuals in order to obtain further information on the subject of Roma research. Future projects existence will be communicated to the network so as the database and the Internet site will receive information after the project is finished.

- Data analysis

Based on the set of indicators elaborated in the research preparation phase a critique of the studies was done trying to cover the following areas:

- Specific findings of the various reports with relevance to a strategy for Roma population;
- Policy area covered and obtained results;
- Programs initiated as a result of the research findings;
- The most important theoretical approaches used in Roma research and their implications for practical projects.

- Used methodology

The universe of the research and types of samples that were used.

The current research report contains this information.

- The database of organisations and individuals who have produced reports/studies has been completed and published on the Internet.

It contains 161 analysed studies and 162 titles presented as bibliography.

- A user-friendly Internet site hosted by www.rroma.ro contains a short description of the project, the database and allows for the possibility to download the research report.

- Disseminating information

Using the network of contacts, the research reports, the database and information about the Internet site are being sent to the stakeholders that we identified during the first step of the project: all Roma organisations in Romania, all participants in the survey, all municipal and regional governments, all government ministries and central agencies, donors and other parties identified as interested in the subject.

2 CONTENT OF ANALYSED STUDIES

2.1. Public policy fields

The most frequently approached areas are: social, economic, youth/education.

The data demonstrate that the social field was the most employed by the researches included in this analysis, the premise being that the Roma constitute a social group exposed to a high risk of poverty and, implicitly, of social exclusion. Many of the studies have been used as background to building strategies and implementing community intervention programs for the Roma. In this regard, the research carried out by the Institute for Quality of Life at the request of Buzau County Council in 1997-1998 allowed the design of a strategy at the county level aimed at improving the Roma social situation.

The economic field, despite its frequent employment by the studies included in analysis, provided a little number of feasible solutions, because of factors that mainly belong to the socio-economic context of Romania's development. The main problem seems to relate to the dilemma: what are the chances of Roma, with a level of education inferior to the majority of the population, to accede to a labour market more and more restrained?

In this context, the theme of education is approached frequently in the analysed studies, and different authors seem to share the idea that education is the main factor that influence Roma's chances for personal and professional development.

Many papers approach several subjects belonging to the same area of concern. The areas of justice and health, although apparently have the lowest representation, still hold significant proportions.

2.2. Used theoretical approach

A total of 43.1% of overall identified papers can be included in the identity approach. This approach considers the traditions, history and everything that forms the specificity of the Roma population.

The socio-economic approach (41.2%) starts from the hypothesis according to which the Roma population is confronted with problems related to poverty and difficulties in securing proper conditions of living.

The approach of relationships with the authority (15.7% of overall studies) discusses aspects related to an institutionalized discrimination against the Roma in their relations with the public authorities and services.

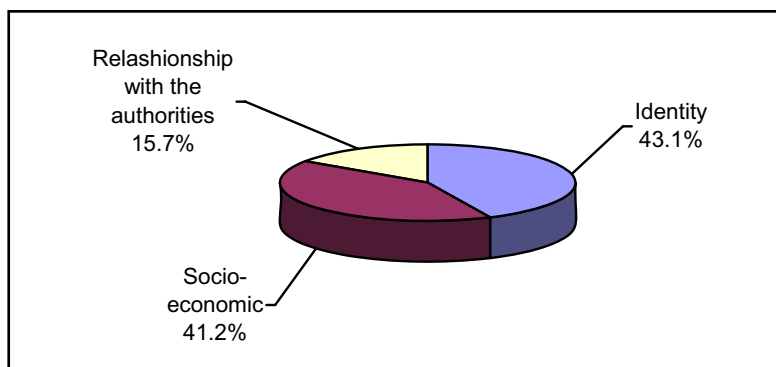

The studies focused on the Roma have been oriented mainly by one of these perspectives. The analysis of the studies shows that Roma identity and relationships with the authorities appear more frequently in studies and reports carried out at the request of national and international institutions, especially those activating in the human rights field. An example, in this regard, refers to Roma children, whose rights are considered not to be respected consequent to discriminatory behaviors.

The language, life style and Roma traditions are themes of interest for many researchers and analysts of Roma issues, especially for those having anthropological or philological background.

The socio-economic approaches emphasise difficult life conditions of the Roma, like: incomes, jobs, poor health conditions, inappropriate dwelling conditions.

Each of the three approaches covers different aspects of the Roma issues, and only a little amount of studies can be considered comprehensive and complete from this point of view.

2.3. Main approached themes

Cultural ethnic identity, relations between the majority and the minority are the subjects orienting most frequently the content of studies (over 75% of the total).

Next are the quality of life with 64% and social integration with 52.2%. Less represented are the studies concerning delinquency and linguistics.

Although in the analysed studies, the number of Roma population does not hold a high share, this is a theme of concern for researchers particularly in the early post-1989 period, being the main aspect that has to be characterised in the diagnosis concerning this population. The data presented in the studies range from the official census data (401,087 individuals) to foreign assessments as high as 2,500,000 individuals. The dispute in this case is between self-identification and hetero-identification, on which there is no consensus.

Delinquency is another element bringing about different opinions of the authors. On the one hand there is the opinion that delinquency is higher in the Roma population than in the majority population, while other authors claim there is no such difference in this respect between the two populations. They mentioned that it is not the ethnic features determining a higher incidence of crime acts, but rather the difficult conditions of living confronting most Roma in Romania.

Romani language is an issue frequently approached by the linguists. Even the analysed studies, directed mainly towards social and not linguistic research, considered more this aspect of the Romani culture. Social policies included rather recently measures for the preservation of Romani language as an important element for the preservation of the Roma identity.

2.3.1. Cultural/ethnic identity

Assuming ethnic identity is the most usual subject within the cultural/ethnic identity (56.6%). The main question is to what extent do the Roma accept the identity of the Roma together with the whole traditional way of life. The conscience of ethnic affiliation is considered as a decisive factor for the improvement of Roma ethnic situation in Romania for the modernisation of Roma communities.

Also important for this approach are the values and patterns of the Roma (48.8%) and community leaders (32.2%).

Of equal importance are the history, origins, traditions, language, affiliation to different ethnic groups, religion, folklore, myths, legends.

Generally, the analysed studies focus on the identification of the characteristics of Roma ethnic identity. On one hand the analyses focus on a strictly cultural component trying to prove the richness and variety of a little known culture. On the other hand the studies analyse the social component regarding the manner of living together, the way of securing resources, the systems of relations settled within Roma communities and outside it, the different kinship groups, the compact or dispersed character of the Roma population.

The conclusion of these studies in this respect is the heterogeneity of the Roma communities, which requires individualised interventions due to the specificity of each community.

2.3.2. Quality of life

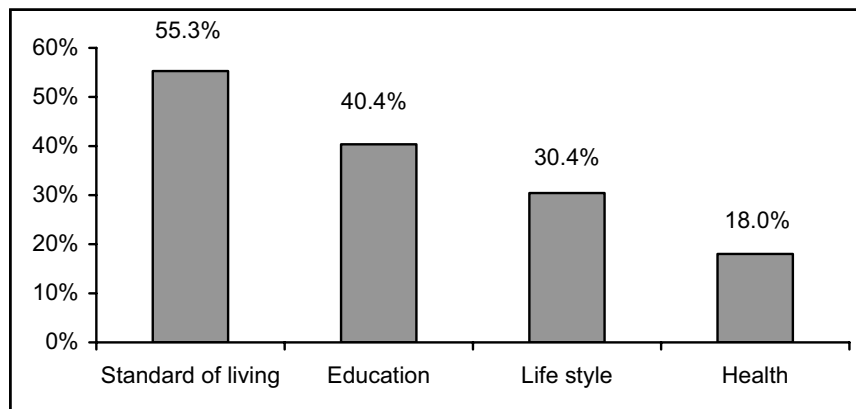

The themes concerning the quality of life establish a hierarchy of the most critical aspects of Roma population: standard of living (55.3%), education (40.4%), life style (30.4%) and health status (18.0%).

Most researchers agree on the low standard of life of the Roma population, considering it as the most critical issue of this population. Several studies, however, disclose the existence of a rich segment within the Roma ethnic group.

Education ranks second. Some researchers state that the relationship between the level of education and the quality of life is not significant, some of the traditional professions do not require high education but bring large incomes to the practitioners.

The statistical analyses show, however, that education is an important factor for the standard of life (Zamfir, E.; Zamfir, C., 1992).

Although the health status is less frequently treated by the analysed studies, the social research gave lately a privileged position to the study of this issue considering that this is an area requiring urgent intervention since the health state of the Roma population is continuously deteriorating.

2.3.2.1. Standard of living

Occupations (42.9%) and incomes (32.3%) are on the top positions concerning the standard of living.

Also approached are: professional training, dwelling endowment, number of children, and self-assessment of the living standard.

The general socio-economic situation of Romania, with the Roma confronted with serious problems of their economic standard and the provision of means of living resulted in a high interest of researchers for these areas.

The occupations of Roma analysed by some studies do not seem to bring an agreement as to their role and future. Some authors stress the need to revive the traditional occupations as a means of raising the economic standard, while others focus on the role of vocational education and improving the education, which might yield a better access on the labour market.

Dwelling and its facilities also are largely analysed by the social investigation. Although the analyses show that the size of dwellings is similar for the Roma and for the majority population, the highlighted critical issues are the density of inhabiting and the poor facilities characterising most dwellings of the Roma population.

The number of children, the higher birth rate than in the majority population, are other elements connected by the analyses to the low standard of living.

2.3.2.2. Life Style

The life style includes as main indicators marriage (20.5%), kinship relations (16.1%), cultural consumption (10.6%) and leisure activities (6.2%).

The life style, an important component of Roma ethnic profile is what distinguishes them from the majority population. It is the result of specific historical conditions, in which the Roma population was determined to live and survive: marginalisation, discrimination, nomadic life, poverty.

The pattern of extended family in which marriage occurs at early age is explained by some authors by the state of poverty, the need for solidarity and the manner of obtaining resources, in which the family members take part from their early years in securing the necessities of living.

The kinship relations act as a protection for all the family members.

The type of cultural consumption and the leisure activities are analysed mainly by the researchers of the cultural component of the Roma identity, showing once more the unique character of some elements which yield, in fact, the specificity of this population.

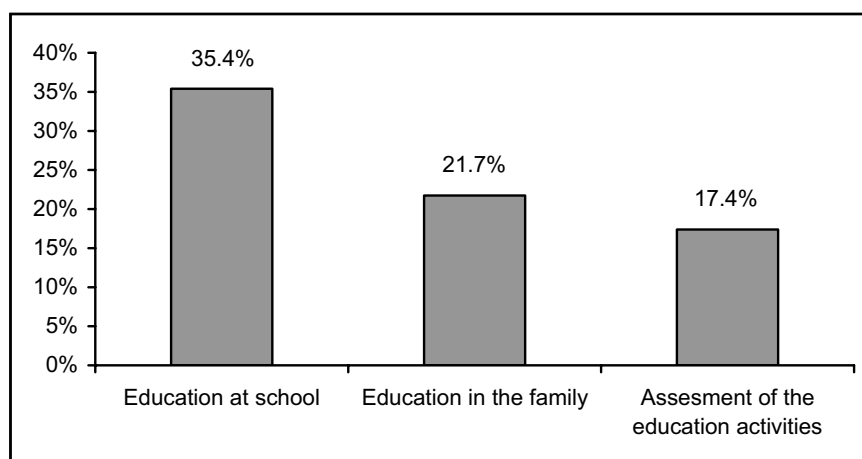

2.3.2.3. Education

The issue of education includes education in school (35.4%), education within the family (21.7%) and assessment of education services (17.4%).

The relevance of Roma's level of education was a constant preoccupation of the researches and of their conclusions. The large array of investigations allowed the clarification of directions that have to be pursued on the short, medium and long term.

The role of preschool and elementary school education is of particular interest due to the low school enrolment of Roma children compared to the overall national school enrolment. Another issue was the impact of the measures of positive discrimination concerning the high school education and the higher education.

The importance of family in Roma children education was revealed by several surveys, which concluded that the family is the main source of influence for a higher school enrolment, next to the educators and teachers. Several community-type patterns for the education of Roma children have resulted from the various surveys.

The access to education and the implications of participation/non-participation determined the Ministry of National Education to develop intensive measures intended to facilitate the participation of Roma children, included in the “Strategy for Roma education”, referring to the enforcement of measures of positive discrimination besides the measures taken in the middle school and high school education and in the higher education, programs for adult education, increased school enrolment in vocational schools, kindergartens, investments in the infrastructure of school for the Roma, co-operation with non-governmental sector involved in Roma education.

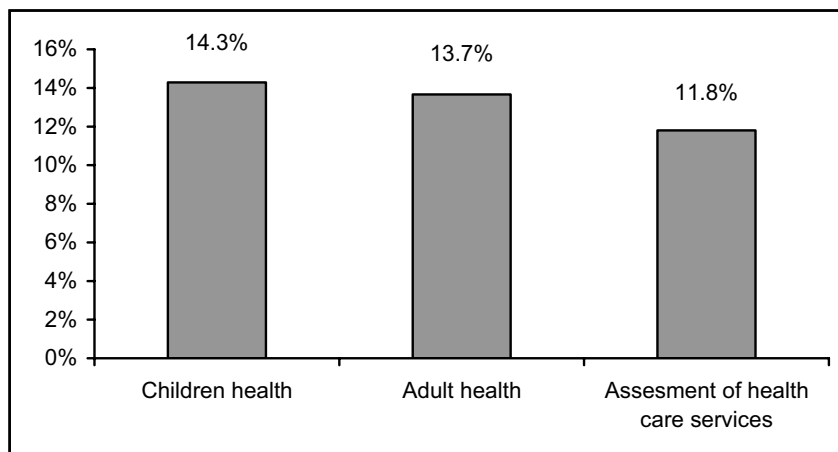

2.3.2.4. Health

The issue of health covered:

- children health (14.3%);
- adult health (13.7%);
- assessment of health care services (11.8%).

The most recent studies focusing on the Roma health show the process of health deterioration and the need for intervention in this field.

The main problems related to the poor health state are due, in the researchers’ opinion, to the access to health care services. Issues such as not granting free medicines for children, improper diagnosis and treatment, discriminatory treatment, argue for the health state of Roma population.

2.3.3. Majority–minority relationship

Within the hierarchy of indicators analysed by the surveys conducted in Romania, the top positions are held by the social representation (48.4%), social distance (42.2%) and stereotypes (39.8%) which the majority population develops in relation with the Roma.

The studies focusing on these issues show that in Romania, as everywhere in the world, the perception of the majority population towards the Roma ethnic is rather negative. The negative social representation seem to have taken shape related to the specific manner of life of the Roma and less to the relation with the status of Roma ethnic.

Measuring the social distance towards the Roma showed that the Roma are one of the most rejected groups.

The stereotypes that have formed concerning the Roma also are mostly negative and seem to be the result of a long historical process of relations between the majority and minority population. The stereotypes, as well as the learned behaviour, may be changed, particularly among the youth. The concept of interculturalism, more and more present in the speech of many researchers, which presumes closeness, conjunction, relations between majority and minority, is often invoked as a principle that has to be introduced in the social policies in an attempt to remove in the long run the negative social representation and stereotypes regarding the Roma.

3 GENERAL INFORMATION ABOUT STUDIES AND AUTHORS

3.1. Analysed population

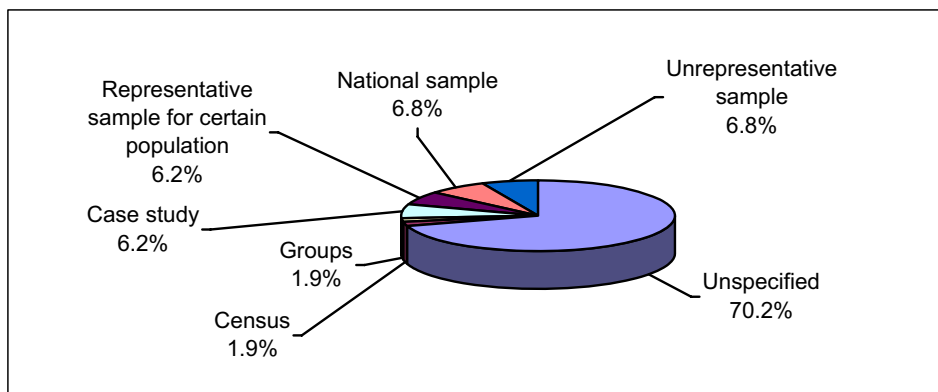

In designing the studies on Roma communities, the specialists in the field were, and still are confronted, with several methodological difficulties.

Concerning the Roma population, we cannot say precisely who is and who is not a Roma. There is controversy regarding the self-identification and the heteroidentification, namely, the manner in which the Roma declare their affiliation or are seen by outsiders.

We may talk of a population of unknown dimension and this is why it is difficult to conduct surveys on representative samples, just due to this controversy. The only institute to conduct so far representative surveys at the national level is the Institute for Quality of Life, the Romanian Academy.

The graph below shows that two thirds of the conducted studies did not specify clearly a population for survey and analysis.

The survey of groups, groups of subjects and case studies was a feasible option for the authors of the studies.

3.2. Data gathering and processing

The attractiveness of such studies determined the use of varied techniques for data collection, processing and analysis.

Data collection was done by individual interviews, questionnaire survey and observation. These techniques were used in about 50% of the conducted studies (data collection and processing).

Document analysis, secondary data analysis and the case studies form the second group of techniques that were used.

Focus groups, content analysis and assessment investigations were less used, their overall proportion barely exceeding 10%.

3.3. Period of study issuing

Although the bulk of reviewed studies were issued after 1990, some studies dating before 1944 and during 1945-1989 have also been identified.

A large number of studies was conducted after 1995 because the interest in the Roma population increased both at the level of the international institutions and at the level of the national and local ones. Another important factor that contributed to the intensification of research was the development of the civil society, particularly of the organizations interested in the interethnic issues.

During the past few years, the research focused less on diagnosis and more on the investigations of intervention-action type, contributing largely to drawing up a policy of intervention and to the arguments for projects actually implemented in the Roma communities.

3.4. Countries where the study was done

The concern for investigations in Roma communities is rather great. Although most studies were conducted by Romanian specialists or institutions (85%), the balance of 15% was done by foreign specialists alone or in collaboration with Romanian specialists. These studies involved mainly the comparative design.

The countries of Central and East Europe where the Roma population is confronted with similar problems supplied several studies that also makes reference to the Roma population in Romania.

Different institutions from the United States, Great Britain and France were also interested in studies on the Roma population.

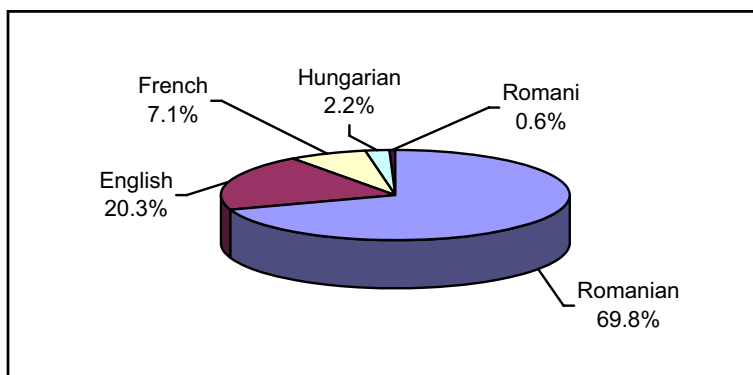

3.5. Language of the papers

Most publications and research reports were drawn up in Romanian (70%).

A significant proportion (20%) were written in English. Some papers are written both in Romanian and English, with different copies for each language.

French, Hungarian and Romani languages account for 10% of the conducted studies.

3.6. Institutions that have conducted studies

Given the specificity of such studies involving a trained staff to conduct them, the array of institutions supplying studies is rather narrow.

The first category includes the universities, the public research institutes and the centers from the non-governmental sector. Most institutions belong to this category.

The second category includes the Roma and non-Roma non-governmental organizations from Bucharest and Cluj-Napoca.

The third category includes the international institutions conducting studies, which involved foreign and Romanian specialists in this field.

The fourth category includes the Romanian central organizations.

The name of these institutions is presented below.

1. "Together" Agency of Community Development
2. Association for Interethnic Dialogue

3.7. Authors of the studies and institutional affiliation in conducting the studies

Most studies and research were not conducted in a strictly institutionalized framework, three quarters being conducted by specialists in the field.

Yet, the most of the specialists supplying studies are employed by institutions with a background in investigations concerning the interethnic relations or the Roma communities.

NGOs conducted numerous studies, either with their own staff, or with specialist staff, by collaboration.

The research institutes and the universities account for about the same proportion with the NGOs which designed and conducted surveys.

3.8. Financing the studies

From the Table below it may be observed that there were several categories of financing organizations:

- international organizations
- international foundations or foundations with branches in Romania
- research institutes
- non-governmental organizations
- Romanian public institutions

Due to the diversity of financing organizations we may also talk of different objectives in study design and of results expected according to the policy of each financing organization.

2. Center of Resources for Ethnic and Cultural Diversity

4 ABSTRACT

- The public policy fields approached in the studies were not exclusive, frequently covering several areas of interest. The social field included over 70% of the papers on the Roma. Other frequently approached domains were economy, youth/education and culture/religion.
- From the viewpoint of the theoretical perspective, the identity approach and the social-economic approach can be found in most studies.
- The main results, from the point of view of their content, may be framed within four categories, cultural/ethnic identity, majority/minority relationships, quality of life and social integration.
- Most studies were conducted after 1990, when the issue of Roma population was acknowledged and it was considered that research may create the premises for feasible and sustained interventions.
- Even if most research studies and reports appeared in Romania, it may be noticed that the concern for these problems is at the international level, too. Most studies were conducted in Central and East Europe, where most Roma live. There are other three countries (USA, Great Britain and France), where numerous studies have been published.
- Romanian is the language most used in the surveys. English was also rather frequently used.
- The array of financing organizations and of institutions that conducted surveys is rather large, showing that there are concerns in various directions to know the Roma population.
- Specialists in the field, more or less employed institutionally carried out most of the studies and investigations.
- NGOs conducted various studies that allowed for identifying priorities for the implementation of programs in various areas of concern.
- The range of analyzed populations is rather wide, from representative to individual case studies.
- The techniques of data collection and processing were varied and they included observation, questionnaire survey, secondary data analysis, content analysis, individual and group interviews, document analysis, case study.
